Introduction

"Your success is determined by your daily agenda." -John Maxwell

Great achievers have always performed well by managing themselves and their abilities. Self-management is important for individuals to perform effectively in both large and small organizations where they are called to perform various duties. Self-management encourages individuals to set their own goals, monitor their own behavior in achieving those goals, and rewarding themselves upon their success in achieving those goals. Self-management is the building block for effective management of other people, groups, and organizations.

The purpose of this course is to:

- Encourage individuals at all levels to develop skills and strategies to direct their own behavior towards achieving their goals
